An appeals court has reinstated the conviction of a former San Francisco police officer who was charged with murder for the killing of a man who had entered his apartment and then later died of a drug overdose, reversing a lower court decision that threw out the conviction. The full court of the 3rd Appellate District on Wednesday sided with prosecutors in the case of Gilbert Arroyo, who was convicted in 2012 of the murder of Elvin Abreu in 2009. Abreu, who was in his 40s and had been convicted of burglary and drug dealing, overdosed on heroin and cocaine in Arroyo's apartment while he was on his way to jail. Arroyo was later found not guilty of Abreu's murder in a separate case. But prosecutors then charged him with the killing based on Abreu's overdose, which he had helped set up, and Arroyo eventually was convicted. In a statement released Wednesday, Arroyo's attorney, Jason P. Steen, called the ruling a major victory for the justice system. "Arroyo's conviction for the murder of Abreu has been set aside," Steen said. "While the death of Abreu was a tragedy, the circumstances that resulted in his death are legal fiction." A request for comment from San Francisco City Attorney Dennis Herrera's office was not immediately returned Wednesday. In their statement, prosecutors called the ruling a win for justice. "Mr. Arroyo's conviction is a victory for justice," said Deputy District Attorney Lori K. Leslie. "The death of Elvin Abreu was a tragedy, and Elvin's family deserves justice." During the 2012 trial, Arroyo's defense team argued that Abreu had died of a drug overdose and had been sleeping when he was shot in the chest, leaving the three 9 mm bullets in his heart. The prosecution's case, which involved forensic evidence, witnesses and Arroyo's own statements to investigators, maintained that Arroyo was angry that Abreu had gained entry into the apartment, where he was hiding from him, and confronted him with
