Accessing FileMaker Pro Features from Outside the FileMaker Pro IDE FileMaker Pro advanced users want to share their data with others. This becomes particularly important for web and mobile developers that want to access databases from outside of FileMaker Pro, for example, to have access to the underlying web services to make database changes.

Previously, web developers could call the openDatabase command, but they were unable to select specific file types to open for editing. FileMaker Pro 11 will now enable developers to do so using file extensions instead. If developers use FileMaker Pro Advanced, they can now select file types (XML, SQLite, and HTML) and data types (records, recordsets, fields, arrays) in FileMaker Pro from other places, such as the browser or application tools. This is accessible using the FDX API and the file extension matching process. FileMaker Pro users are able to use the FDX API through Xcode, build tools, and other programming environments. This is a new feature in version 11 and is enabled by default when you upgrade to FileMaker Pro Advanced. Technical and Performance Improvements in FileMaker Pro 11 JSON Data Type and FileMaker's DataCite Data Fitting
