Because of the heterogeneity of the hardware components available in different computing environments, virtualization systems may be utilized to efficiently share resources amongst a number of VM's. In some cases, a single physical host can have several

VMs deployed on it. In some situations, a host with more than one processor may have a single VM. However, in some situations, a host may have multiple VMs on the same processor, and in yet other situations, the host may have one or more VMs on each of the host's processors. In some cases, the VM itself can take advantage of the virtualization technology to present an environment to its own guests. In some cases, these VMs may generate "interrupts" that may cause the CPU to stall for a particular amount of time. For example, interrupts can cause the CPU to stall for the duration of the interrupt. In some cases, the duration of the interrupt may vary. For example, the duration of the interrupt can be dictated by the priority of the interrupt. In yet other situations, the duration of the interrupt can be set by an administrator on the VM. In some cases, a high priority interrupt can cause the CPU to stall for a longer duration than a low priority interrupt. In some cases, the duration of the stall can depend on the request made by a guest. However, in many cases, when the duration of the interrupt is very long, such as several seconds, this can cause performance issues on the host, in particular when the performance of the VM is affected. For example, performance could be reduced when one or more of the guests (or VMs) on the host is/are performing system level operations. For instance, the performance of the guest operating system can be negatively impacted by the fact that the ba244e880a
