Live measures of ambient temperature - 1WeatherLive, "1" - 2017/10/02 - 2020/01/31". Vilnius/Lithuania. 28. The February 15, 2020 El Nino conditions are resulting in a sea-surface temperature anomaly that is positive across the eastern Pacific Ocean in a region from the dateline to Peru. This El Nino event is historically associated with winter weather and drought in California, southern Australia, and southern Africa. In the 21st century, NOAA scientists have identified a new broad, warm El Nino that began in fall 2016 and is still ongoing. The latest global climate model forecasts predict the occurrence of this new event. While state of California drought and El Niño strengthen and reduce rainfall, some of the country's most populous cities have received tens of millions of additional rain on their wettest January on record. San Francisco, California, received 11.5 inches (29.2 cm) of rain in January, more than 10 inches (25.4 cm) above normal, and Sacramento, California, recorded 12.1 inches (31 cm) of rain, its wettest January in 35 years. The snowy Sierra Nevada received an average 9 inches (22 cm) of snowfall across the state, with some snowfall totals exceeding 1 ft (30 cm), also on record. Los Angeles, California, recorded 6.5 inches (16.5 cm) of rain, which beat its previous record of 4.6 inches (11.6 cm) set in February 1984. As California climate shifts, it's complicated to track the overall number of California record rainfall and snowfall for each month. Many areas of the United States are far less wet than California. A sub-region of the southeastern United States, for instance, has seen a total of 6 inches (15 cm) of rain in January, which is the rainiest January in the region since 2010. 1 inch (25.4 cm) ...
