Category:Linguistics Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu attends the weekly cabinet meeting at his office in Jerusalem November 14, 2017. (Ronen Zvulun/Reuters) Netanyahu's stewardship of Israel might be a stretch for even the most hard-core Likud activist. Two reports late last week appeared to offer, with varying degrees of certainty, evidence that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has taken steps to avoid prosecution for bribery and corruption charges. One of the reports was from CBS News, the other from the Times of Israel. They were both based on information provided by a source said to be close to the prime minister and with "direct knowledge" of his actions. So this is what we now know. (1) The source is an Israeli intelligence official with access to top-level conversations. (2) Netanyahu asked to meet with that source, indicating that he was interested in receiving classified information in exchange for promising to make the source's life more pleasant. (3) Netanyahu's request for information was apparently accepted. (4) Netanyahu did, in fact, give the source some information. (5) The source's life did, in fact, become more pleasant. (6) Netanyahu asked the source not to repeat his conversation with him, and the source agreed.

(7) The source's agreement not to report was honored. (8) Netanyahu received information that may or may not have been helpful to him. (9) Netanyahu's aides know about the exchange, which makes the prime minister look guilty. (10) Netanyahu isn't talking about the meeting. At the core of these reports is a single exchange that occurred during a November 2015 meeting between Netanyahu and the source. Netanyahu did not ask the source to bring up a specific topic, as he had with former Israel-American-Jewish-lobbyist Lev Leviev, for instance. He did not ask for a specific amount of information. Netanyahu did not ask for anything in return. He did not set a time frame for when he wanted to give the source information. In short, 2d92ce491b
