Medical disasters can be classified as cognitive or emotional. Cognitive or information-related disasters involve errors of patient information, medical record keeping or medical procedure. Emotional disasters may take the form of clinical and regulatory failures, but more typically involve failures to take proper account of the rights, emotions, and feelings of patients, as when an inattentive clinician fails to adequately warn a patient about a serious drug interaction or serious side effect. If the patient is someone with a mental illness, these failures can have a devastating effect. They may result in death, or in permanent or even fatal brain injury. But the same disasters can occur in a medical setting, for instance as a consequence of errors in interpreting vital signs and the timely administration of life-saving medication. Medical disasters resulting from medical errors, although they do occur, are much less common than patient suicide, which causes 70 to 100 times as many deaths in psychiatric settings than medical errors. The former will cost the healthcare system up to $3 billion dollars each year, while the latter are covered in the $4 billion range. A patient who is suicidal can be rescued by a brief conversation between a clinician and patient; the distress of a suicidal person can be relieved by the discovery that she is not alone and there are people who care about her. The same is not true of a person who is being medicated improperly. The suicides of some young people who have been involuntarily medicated are well known to clinicians and public authorities. But the lives of many people who are involuntarily medicated, often for years, and who are not receiving adequate treatment, are little known. Yet, it is a well-established fact that a large fraction of all persons with serious mental disorders, including some who are suicidal, are involuntarily medicated. I should note that I use the term involuntarily medicated here to mean that the patient
