So if I were to deploy my website using the ARM template that Azure provides for this, I would have to do all this manually as these settings have to be changed each time I want to deploy to Azure. Can I simply replace the content of the file which is generated by the ARM template with that generated by the Azure template? In doing this, I can avoid configuring the credentials and other settings for the database and application at that level? I have looked through the documentation but I have not found anything that is suitable for me and I am not able to find any examples of this either. Thank you A: Yes, you can do that, but note that it can be costly because the ARM template is going to have to parse the whole template and then recompile it. You can reduce this cost by using arm templates to create a resource group template and then use that to create the main ARM template. For example, if you have a resource group template like this: { "schema": "", "contentVersion": "1.0.0.0", "parameters": { "appName": { "type": "string" }, "appId": { "type": "string" }, "appSecret": { "type": "string" }, "myUserEmailAddress": { "type": "string" } }, "resources": {
