Pallidal stimulation for the treatment of chronic pain associated with multiple sclerosis: Case report. To present a novel and safe method for pallidal stimulation in a patient with multiple sclerosis (MS) and chronic intractable pain. The patient, a 45-year-old male, presented with chronic pain in the left hand and hand tremor, which had been present since 2001. He had a history of MS and was being treated with alemtuzumab for relapsing-remitting MS. He had been treated with multiple medications for the pain, but without any significant clinical improvement. Bilateral deep brain stimulation (DBS) was performed and two separate leads were placed in the left globus pallidus internus. The patient experienced marked improvement of the pain and tremor. The patient remained stable with a decrease in pain and tremor at the last follow-up examination in January, 2012, 17 months after the DBS. DBS of the
