Patient physical and social factors associated with adherence to treatment after inpatient rehabilitation in patients with spinal cord injury. There is some data that adherence to treatment after inpatient rehabilitation for spinal cord injured (SCI) patients may be sub-optimal. We measured adherence to treatment after SCI inpatients in relation to physical and psychosocial factors in a large database. Patient characteristics of 4,567 persons with a SCI treated in a rehabilitation hospital in Australia were collected. Adherence to treatment was operationalized as a dichotomized adherence score including data on adherence to different treatment modalities. Data were collected from 2007 to 2014. The sample was generally adherent to prescribed medical treatment (n =

4,038, 80%). Patients' self-reported level of psychological distress, self-efficacy and mastery was inversely associated with adherence to exercise prescriptions. Self-reported health status, physical disability, and perceived discrimination were independently associated with adherence to drug prescriptions. Patients had a high adherence to medical prescription, but a lower adherence to education, advising others, and preventing infection. Our findings suggest that enhancing patients' psychosocial well-being has an important effect on adherence to treatment after rehabilitation. I was reading up on an article about getting skin problems fixed with a vitamin peel (Facial Oxygen Peel, Lancôme). This peeling thing looks pretty easy to do. The article says you only have to peel for 15 seconds. Heck,
