Inside the Comic Inside the Comic is a monthly business magazine for the comic book, cartoon, and gaming industries. History Inside the Comic is a monthly magazine, originally published in the late 1990s by Steve Jackson Games, that focuses on the business and marketing aspects of the various comic and game industries. In the past decade, the magazine has been published by John Butterworth of Butterworth Media, and currently resides at the Butterworth offices. In the December 2003 issue, Inside the Comic broke a longstanding taboo in the comics industry by publishing a one-page parody advertisement for DC Comics' Superman: What Makes Him So Successful? in which readers were given the answer: "He's The Man of Steel! Clark Kent is his real name!" The publisher received substantial criticism for the ad, even resulting in a cease and desist letter from DC Comics. A few months later, it was revealed that a letter from the ad had been sent to DC Comics. The issue that contained the ad was on sale December 23, 2003. The Comic Book Legal Defense Fund (CBLDF) defended the magazine from the threat of litigation, but advised the magazine's publisher, Steve Jackson Games, that any future violations of the DC Comics trademark would be prosecuted. On June 5, 2011, David Nolen, who had just resigned as the Publisher of Back Issue magazine, took over the role of Executive Publisher. He has since moved the magazine from its previous publisher, Butterworth Media Group, into editorial partnership with DC Comics, so that it can remain in their official publication program. 80eaf3aba8
