Q: Intercepting and Handling Windows Forwarded Connections When a Windows Service starts it listens for incoming connections. When a Windows service receives a connection it forwards it to a specific endpoint. Is it possible to intercept these connections and set a specific endpoint to forward them to? If so, how? Background: I have a process which is a timer. When the timer expires I make a request to a specific URL. When this request gets through I need to forward it to somewhere else. But for security reasons I need to do this with a connection that is not in my Windows Service. A: Yes, this is possible. The client application is listening for incoming connection requests at a predefined port. The connection request arrives at the port of the server that you want to forward the connection to. The server listens for incoming connection requests at a predefined port. When it receives a connection request, it forwards the connection to a URL/Ip address specified by you. In any case, the client application will be allowed to connect to port it is listening to, and the server will be allowed to connect to port you want it to listen to. When a client app connects to a port specified by a server, you may do any number of things, depending on the implementation. I assume there is a Windows service that does not listen to the port you are referring to, so the client app would have to be listening to the port that your Windows Service is listening to. In the example above, you may then forward the connection to a php-backend that does database-related operations. Hope this helps. NOTE: The accepted answer appears to use the net-namedpipe (NDP) protocol. This is a deprecated protocol. Use net-mqtt instead.
