I can't think of anyone I know who would qualify. But hey, maybe you can! So today I'm taking a shot at listing some of my favorites who aren't in the list. There's an easy trick to remember if you think you might qualify: someone or something "superheroic", "brilliant", "imaginative", etc. on the list has to have at least three facts associated with it that don't necessarily apply to everyone (e.g., the comic-book artist has to have been at least ten years old when he created it; it has to have been published in a comic book; it has to have been in the public domain for a while) and it can't be anything that can be done in any other medium that's outside of the mainstream. Here we go, in no particular order: Dennis O'Neil (artist/writer/editor) Weird Science That's it, I'm done. I'm going to list a couple more. ————— On the same note, here's my list of artists and writers who should be on the BDC Hall of Fame if the criteria were changed. I'm sure there's at least one of them. Fred Hembeck (artist/writer) I Can Draw! Fred Hembeck's self-teaching graphic novel, I Can Draw!, was the first of its 77a5ca646e

Malfunctioning in the middle of the sea is no fun at all. Ocean's book collection includes several original artworks by Tim Burrett, who brought a realistic and gritty touch to its many collectable shipwrecks. The world-famous game has a variety of worlds and islands, but only three oceans. However, no matter how beautiful the setting is, how strange is it that all the regions we know so well from the main game are only covered by a small part of the map, while new areas that are supposed to be fascinating get not even a word of description
