The game is addicting.The purpose of these studies is to define the characteristics of selected brain cells and their constituent proteins as they relate to development, maintenance and function and how these characteristics are affected by amino acids or other nutritional factors. Central nervous system cells will be analyzed by: (1) morphological studies on Golgi preparations and morphometric analysis of Nissl-stained sections; (2) immunocytochemical studies using monoclonal antibodies raised to primary cultures of both basal forebrain cholinergic neurons (BFNC) and neurons in spinal cord, dorsal root and optic chiasm; (3) cytochemical and ultrastructural analysis of cerebral microvilli (choroid plexus) and their cells. Immunocytochemical and electron microscopic analysis will be used to screen for: (1) specific antigenic markers of individual cells, as a direct means of understanding cell function and pathology; (2) differentially processed, post-translationally modified peptide fragments of neuron-specific glycoproteins that are essential for cell-cell interactions during development; and (3) specific alterations in the composition of the neural membranes due to nutritional or physiological perturbations. The effects of dietary amino acids on the concentrations, composition, pattern of glycosylation and distribution of membrane glycoproteins in neuronal cells will be investigated. Amino acids and drugs will be administered to neonatal rats or adult monkeys by intracerebral microdialysis or
