Otherwise, the admission officers might think you have problems following instructions and will surely do the same in following the rules of the university. The admission board usually provides the candidates with different prompts to write the essay. These prompts can include writing a story about yourself, telling them about a challenge you overcame, an incident that taught you a lesson, or an open choice of whatever you want to write.

College admission officers have to read hundreds of essays. Hence, in order to catch their eye and convince them that you are the perfect candidate for selection, you need to understand what they are looking for. The selectors usually look for talented students that they believe will bring honor to their college and will secure successful feats in their future. Therefore, you must describe yourself as a capable student who satisfies this criterion. Hence, before you craft your essay, make sure to jot down key points about yourself that can assure the admission officers that you are an ambitious individual. However, be sure not to repeat yourself by mentioning anything from your resume or application. While composing the essay, you must define your short and long-term goals and the distinctive abilities that make you stand out among the rest of the contenders. The things you can include in the essay to distinguish yourself from the others can include a sports team you have been a part of, an instrument you play, the handicraft skills you have, any different languages you speak, or any other unique accomplishment.

The organization of the essay is one thing that I consider the most important when I write my paper. Many students write remarkable essays but do not have their applications approved because they ignore the basic structure of an essay. An essay is put together by an introduction, body, and conclusion paragraphs that are all equally important. Sometimes admission officers do not have the time to read the whole thing and they go through the introduction or conclusion paragraphs of your essay. However, if your essay's introduction does not tell the reader what he or she should expect in the upcoming body paragraphs, then they might just put it away without reading it any further. Therefore, make sure your essay is well-structured. Some colleges also provide their own formats or structures of the essay. If that is the case for you, do not get off-track and include whatever the college has asked of you.
