The present invention relates to a lamp tube, and in particular to a lamp tube for an electric bulb. The electric bulb preferably is a miniature incandescent light bulb. More specifically, the present invention relates to an electric bulb having a thread or a thread-like element extending along the bottom surface of the electric bulb, which serves as a socket. U.S. Pat. No. 4,875,366 discloses a lamp having a tubular base. The base is fastened in a lamp base by screwing in a threadlike element extending along the bottom surface of the base. The threadlike element is pressed in a recess in the lamp base in a direction parallel to the axis of the tubular base. This prior art lamp structure and method for installation has the disadvantage that, during assembly, pressure must be applied to the threadlike element, which can be difficult because of the small dimensions. There is a danger that the threadlike element will twist unintentionally during assembly or be unintentionally twisted during assembly, which makes installation difficult. Also, the lamp base and the threadlike element are deformed permanently during assembly and cannot be separated without breaking the threadlike element.

L'N, a heterodimeric protein of the inverted repeat superfamily, is the main effector of a tumor suppressor gene in human breast cancer cells. The ras gene, a product of the H-ras oncogene, induces a morphological transformation of NIH 3T3 mouse fibroblasts but not of a panel of human tumor cell lines. In an attempt to identify regulators of the ras-induced tumorigenicity, we screened a human tumor cDNA library for the c-ras effector. A novel protein, L'N, encoded by c-ras was identified as the effector that is required for the transformation activity of the ras oncogene in NIH 3T3 cells, whereas no binding of this protein to c-ras could be detected in human tumor cells. The transforming activity of L'N is very restricted and has been mapped to an 80-amino acid sequence near the amino terminus. This domain, in conjunction with a conserved tryptophan residue, is sufficient for transformation. L'N is a novel member of the inverted repeat superfamily (IRS) of proteins, characterized by the presence of one or two conserved tryptophan residues near the amino terminus. Deletion of amino acids 1-3, which includes the region that has been reported

The spatiotemporal dynamics of pattern formation in insect olfactory systems. The ability to sense and remember the position of odours is a key behavioral trait of insects. This ability is likely based on the activity of olfactory (and mechanosensory) neurons. A growing number of studies have revealed the detailed local organization of the olfactory system at the level of the olfactory glomeruli. Our current understanding of how olfactory glomeruli represent space is mostly based on the observation of the intact olfactory system, although the complete map of glomeruli has not been revealed. Here, we review the recent progress made in identifying neuronal connections between glomeruli and presenting potential explanations for the formation of glomeruli. We also discuss spatial properties of odour coding and temporal aspects of olfactory coding in insects.io/s3fs-fuse
